Excerpt: . . . governors, if we do not find the wisdom and virtue of Cicero, or any other of his qualities, except his vanity, we are at least happy in meeting with no imitators of Verres or Geifler. CHAP, CHAP. XIX. Hilory of an Emigrant Family, OUR excursions, in the neighbourhood of Bellinzone, had more than the charms of new and sublime scenery to imprint them on my memory: a moral interest has impressed them on my heart. There accident led me to the dwelling of Madame C; and I cannot resist indulging myself by relating the incident, to which I owe the few short, but well-remembered hours, which were gilded by the charm of her society. I will not name the valley, where I found her, and by so doing expose her cottage to the prophane gaze of curiosity: but without discovering her abode, I may safely describe its situation; since in that romantic country, how many cottages are placed, like hers, near. . . near the steep bank of a torrent stream, surrounded by luxuriant vegetation, veiled by festoons of vines, sheltered above by the hanging woods of fir and pine, and bounded far beyond by the bare rock, and the shining Glacier. In one of our rambles, at some distance from Bellinzone, we ascended a mountain, the summit of which, we were told, commanded a prospect that would repay us for the toil. The path, however, we found, not merely steep, but so rugged,...
